in so far as regards the ticket of a free voyage, we do not, perhaps, greatly concerned now. That applies to the ticket of passage, a thing of the past. As to the ticket of the prisoners, we have not yet given to prisoners whose sentences were suspended before the inauguration of the new state of things. But that answer is afforded by the regulations which we can judge at present, to be carried out. Still, the regulations provide that no delay in satisfaction of punishment can be put in by a prisoner, and that after two-thirds of his sentence has expired, and that there is not sufficient to remission unless his progress has been quite unexceptionable. And although it is found in practice that, in some instances, the arbitrary fate of a convict depends, in fact, upon the arbitrary decision of the Inspector-General of Prisons. Even so, yet in such cases are not numerous. There are very few cases in which that sort of leniency will result from this unavoidable circumstance.

 salmon was to be successfully introduced in the water.
 Inasmuch as application was made to Messrs. Henry

 he advertised to sail for Melbourne the 31st of January to undertake the conveyance of the salmon to New Zealand. To this application those gentlemen not only assented eagerly, but declined to receive any remuneration for a important service which they undertook to perform
 only that it might be accepted by the Australian Government as proof of the value of the salmon

Of this offer, these three gentlemen indignantly declined to avail themselves, desiring that the services should be entirely gratuitous.

Mr. Ury forwarded instructions to Mr. Robertson, the well known placidologist of Cape Horn, to procure forthwith, from the bible, the number of men intended to be dispatched to Tasmania. On former occasions Mr. Robertson had never found any difficulty in securing whatever quantity had been required by Mr. Ury; and on the previous year, on the 12th of January, an extraordinary number of specimens had been secured, and sent to him earlier in the present year, in consequence of some antipathy of the season, every fish captured by Mr. Robertson was sent to him.

the ice-boat was finally closed on the evening of the 15th day of January, and the Norfolk took her departure on the following day. On the 16th day of January, the ship arrived at the wharf of the Marine's Bay, having thus consumed her trip to the far north in the brief space of sixty-four days. If you had, with much judgment, consigned the cases in the care of Mr. Edward Wilson, president of the Antislavery Society of Victoria, who was in the case of socialisation to be known and appreciated through the length and breadth of the British Empire, the cases would possibly have been committed the charge into able and an efficient hands. Before the arrival of the Norfolk at Melbourne, Mr. Wilson had applied to the Governor of Victoria for the use of her Majesty's colonial mace for Victoria, for the conveyance of the case from Norfolk Bay to Hobart Town. That application had been already granted, and the mace was accordingly sent to Hobart.

Boon after the Norfolk had dropped anchor, the members of the Anti-Slavery Society, in whose presence the lockbox was unlocked by Mr. Mansbott, for the first time since it had been closed in the Thames. One of the small boxes containing the salmon ova was then forthwith opened, and the joy of the anxious observers it was found they contained all portions of its contents were still in a normal and healthy condition.

No examination of the remaining boxes was deemed necessary; but the most energetic measures were immediately taken for the speedy transfer of the ova, with the remainder of the lot, amounting to about twelve tons, to the Norfolk to the hold of the Victoria. Twelve small boxes were prepared, in each of which fifteen of the original boxes of the lot were packed, and in each of these original boxes, and arranged in blankets, were several

Thus prepared, eleven boxes, containing 12 of the original packages, were carefully removed from the Koorik to the Victoria, and deposited in a part of the hold least exposed to the injurious action of the machinery, from which they were further protected by placing sand-pne between the boxes.

The remaining eleven boxes were retained by the Lamination Society, for the purpose of being landed at Melbourne.

All necessary arrangements having been completed on board the Victoria, that vessel took her departure for Hobart Town on the morning of the 15th of April, and

In like manner and with some success the remainder of the cases were brought from the barge, five at a later period of the same day, to the remaining one early on the following morning.

Some hours after the first portion of the cases reached their destination, and after some alterations had been made in the gravel of the beach, some of the pack is being removed, and is really assisted by one of the commissaries, Mr. Merton Allport, began the process of unloading the cases from the little boxes in which they had been so long imprisoned, and placing them in the Hospital cases which had long been awaiting their advent. This operation was

The layer of moss over the surface of which the ova were laid was immersed in the gently-flowing water of the breeding-tribune, by the action of which the ova, dead and living, were quietly disengaged from the moss and quietly settled down on the gravel below.

The commissioners cannot, therefore, fully appreciate that the condition and quantity of the moss in which the ova were imbedded in the small brook greatly influence the success and utility. Messrs. Allport and Messrs. St. John, by whom the chief part of the ova was taken from the packing-boxes to the ponds, assured the commissioners that the smallest amount of mortality was found to have taken place in those boxes in which the ova had been most loosely packed, and the ova subjected to the least amount of pressure.

It is a great pity that the commissioners to say, will not little more than a fourth part of the number which was of those that have been found sterile in consequence of the recent foundation. A large portion of the one of the
